What makes these tires better than others?

IT'S 3-T CORD

and only GOODYEAR has it!

What is 3-T? Does 3-T cost more?

3-T cord is the result of Goodyear's precise Tension, Temperature, and Time control process for treating rayon and nylon tire cords.

Why is 3-T better?

Untreated rayon and nylon tend to stretch under tension. 3-T controls this "stretch" and increases the strength and resistance to fatigue.

Terms as low as $12.25 a week for a set of feds.

A RATHER RUGGED TRAVERSE

Supposing that engineer George B. Hills were to come from his office in Jacksonville, and suppose further that he wanted to travel from West Palm Beach to Canal Point. I have an idea that if it were to take him more than an hour to cover the forty odd miles, he would feel like going to the State Board of Department. Notwithstanding this, he has told me that he first time he made this trip, travelling all the time, it had taken him more than thirty days. But of course, that was in 1913, and two, he was making a traverse.

Now, a traverse is a survey made in one definite direction, and is necessarily made on foot. At that time few people had ever crossed the Everglades. Such a traverse was not a job for any guy with lace on his pants.

After the state of Florida had begun the reclamation of the Everglades and had already dug several canals, it belatedly decided that there was yet considerable which it did not know about the project. Accordingly, the trustees of the Internal Improvement Fund appointed a Florida Engineering Commission headed by Dr. Isham Randolph, a noted engineer, and charged it with reporting on the "practicability of draining the Everglades, and recommendations as to the methods by which such drainage may be accomplished."

Two survey parties were organized. One, under J. B. Phoebe, was to cross the Glades from Dade City (now Florida City) to the Gulf of Mexico to establish the southern limits of the Everglades "beyond which, due to brackish water, reclamation would not be considered." The other party under George B. Hills was to run a transit line and take levels and soundings to rock from the Atlantic Ocean to Lake Okeechobee. Their function was to fix the exact location of the lake, ascertain its elevation, and likewise determine if their route might be practical for a canal to control the level of the lake.

In April of 1913 Mr. Hills, with a party of 14 men, set out from West Palm Beach. Their supplies and equipment, which included several small "glade" boats, were hauled in wagons drawn by oxen. The party strung out through the woods. Ax and machete men ahead cut trail for the transit man and his rodmen. Behind them, chains with tape and pegs, measured the distance. The level crew leisurely brought up the rear. Except for a couple of miles of Loxahatchee Slough, the way lay mostly through high pine land varied by an occasional cypress strand — just typical woods.

However, after passing the present Loxahatchee Farm, pines gave way to stunted cypress, which merged into the muck and sawgrass of the Everglades. Here the supplies were loaded into the boats and the ox wagons returned to town. Along this eastern margin of the Glades were numerous small "heads" or hammocks of magnolia, bay and myrtle, elevated a foot or more above the water. Here, for the last time, the men were able to sleep on the ground. Beyond these heads they had to sleep in boats or on heaps of sawgrass cut and piled above the water, "gator nests" they called them.

The way now lay for many miles through the "clump area" of marshy sawgrass full of bogs, sloughs and floating sloughs. The sloughs might be four to six feet wide and four or five feet deep, were clear of any growth, and often flowed with some current. Hills thought they might have been made by alligators travelling from place to place, for there was undoubtedly no scarcity of the saurians. At night their eyes, shining red in the moonlight, seemed as numerous as the stars. He wondered that there were enough fish and turtles available to feed such a multitude.

As the party progressed westward the higher ground elevation supported a denser and loftier growth of sawgrass reaching six or eight feet into the air. Here the gators lived in holes and ponds which were surrounded by pigweeds and coarse leaved ferns. Due to the season, the glades were drying up and these gators harbored moccasins by the scores. Sloughing through the soft muck, bogging in gator ponds and dodging water moccasins, was, no doubt unpleasant enough, but the unending expanse of dense sawgrass presented a perplexing barrier, its knife-like, three edged leaves scratching and cutting hands to the bone and whittling knees out of pants as they forced their way through it.

After leaving the terra firma of the piney woods, the method of surveying was radically changed. Due to the softness of the ground, a man would sink to his knees at every step, if indeed, he did not bog to his waist or deeper. On this unstable base the use of instruments with any degree of accuracy was incredibly difficult. Tripod legs on transit and level were equipped with long extensions which could be pushed deep into the ground.

Even so, a man stepping twenty feet away or even a gust of wind would throw it out of adjustment. The transit man now seldom used his instrument. Instead, he walked far ahead of his crew and with binoculars, aligned the man setting stakes behind him.

Leveling presented a baffling problem, since a level must be sighted toward a graduated rod resting on the elevation point behind, then reversed and sighted on the new elevation ahead. The instrument man dared not move from his tracks to sight both ways, so now three men were posted at the instrument. One sighted on the rod ahead, another, turning the level on its pivot, sighted on the rod ahead, while the third, or "bubble man," watched the bubble in the leveling level and told them when to take the readings. In the interest of accuracy, this operation might be repeated several times.

When, due to shoaling water, the boats could proceed no further, the party divided. One crew with its instruments continued on foot. The remainder were instructed to proceed to Lake Okeechobee as best they could. The Hillsboro canal was then under construction from the lake eastward, and it was believed that by following the sloughs they could reach the canal and follow it to the lake, which, in fact, they succeeded in doing.

In the instrument party, after many more days of sawgrass climbing, eventually arrived at the custard apple swamp in the vicinity of Canal Point. Leaving everything but axes and machetes they were engaged from dawn till dusk in the dense jungle. Fallen trees, interlaced branches, undergrowth, vines and giant ferns made this short distance of the swamp to penetrate of the whole difficult journey. After eight strenuous hours they finished their trek through 6,000 feet of hard and emerged on the sandy shore of East Beach. They were surprised and overjoyed to discover their companions in the boats, skirting the shore looking for them. The pleasure of this reunion was enhanced by the timely arrival of a fish company's runboat from which they obtained some very welcome ice. After a full day of rest and recuperation they went to their abandoned instruments and carried the survey on through the swamp to the sand beach of the lake.

A monument of concrete, recording the location and elevation was established on the lake shore ridge, after which they crossed the lake and ran a survey from LaBelle to Brown's Store and Chokoloskee.

Next time you drive from Loxahatchee to Canal Point through miles of high, dry farms and pastures, and carry your imagination back to the time when George B. Hills and his boys wading knee deep in mud, waist deep in water, and head deep in sawgrass, with moccasins in front, alligators behind and mosquitoes in between. It might require a bit of imagination.

Employment Service Office Here Provides Service To The Glades

The employment office in the Glades is definitely a service organization and as such, should be providing a service that is needed by the area with which it is entrusted. Here then is criteria by which to judge a public office on the basis of the need for, and the provision of, service.

A current, up-to-date listing of persons seeking employment is essential to the successful operation of any employment office, public or private. The application card on each such person should be so complete that a face-to-face re-interview would be totally unnecessary. Such completeness is the first duty that the employment office has to the job applicant.

An incomplete, inaccurate, sloppy application card, willy nilly cost the job seeker a good work and deny an employer the chance to hire the right worker for the job opening.

Common sense dictates that there are only two basic working tools in an employment office. The application is one of them. Success or failure of all other employment programs is directly traceable to the application card.

The other basic tool is the order. A current, up-to-date list of job opening must be maintained at all times in the employment office. The job information on the job order must be so complete as to answer fully all reasonable questions an applicant might have about a job.

It is the duty of the employer to ask him all about the job else he may be sent the wrong applicant, while the right one remains unemployed or obtains work elsewhere on a job that uses less than all of the worker's skills, knowledge and abilities.

It is almost criminal for a good stenographer to be working as a file clerk when some employer needs her services desperately and is willing to pay for them. Likewise, a qualified automobile mechanic might be forced to join as a service station attendant while customer's cars in a local garage remain idle for the lack of good mechanics.

When an employment office finds itself with up-to-date lists of applicants and job openings, it is in a position to render effective service. It should be obvious that everything that is done from this point on, to have applicants and employers alike make increased use of the employment facilities, is good for all concerned; the employer, the applicant, the community and the national economy.

It takes no great brain to figure out that there are those who require special assistance in obtaining employment as contrasted with those to whom a minimum of assistance is required for effective job help.

The 33-year-old, healthy, capable, educated, intelligent, well awake, occupationally set, red-blooded American man is a cinch to place in a job. Every employer wants him, for he is the ideal employee and "you can't hardly get that kind no more." He is already working. The facts must be faced that the numbers of unemployed workers in this category are so small that to be almost negligible.

However, if you omit one or more of the above adjectives as applied to such a worker, special assistance becomes necessary if that worker is to find suitable work. In the face of our rapidly expanding economy, the "ideal" worker force has been gobbled up, and all there remains is the young and perhaps inexperienced, the man who has all the characteristics of the ideal worker save one; his left hand, perhaps, or the older worker above 45 with no handicap at all except the age barrier that some employers have erected in helping those who need assistance in choosing a wise course in choice of careers.

Each employer order received should be looked upon as an order for a person who has had or will need special assistance from the job opening. Let's face it. Most employers exhaust employee possibilities from among their friends and acquaintances before they phone the employment office.

They are fairly certain that advertising will not bring them the ideal employee. They are told that the employment office has been supplying other workers for them. Thus is torn the job order for the perfect employee.

The interviewers, however, have a dual responsibility to help the worker get the best job possible, and to help the employer get the best possible in the shortest possible time, and unless the perfect employee has just walked in from the front door some compromise will have to be effected.

It might also be stated here that the perfect employee may well have something to say about the perfect employer and may not find perfection in the employer's job offer.

The job interviewer has a duty to the employer to find the worker who most nearly meets the standards as set forth by order. He must also find the job order that most nearly meets the skills, knowledge and abilities of the worker.

In almost 100% of the cases, some compromise is necessary whether it is compromise on age, physical handicap, experience, sex, appearance, or ability, but the remarkable thing about it all, is that the compromise is generally successful.

Perhaps the reason is that how well an employer's job must be done is a relative thing, and dependent entirely upon the needs of the employer. If the employer can afford to wait "forever" before relaxing a restrictive order, his business obviously suffers no real and abiding pain.
